The adjutant alone stood in the colonel's presence as Blake knocked and entered. All others had gone. There was a moment's hesitation, and the colonel paused and looked his man over before he spoke:

"You will excuse my meeting you so, Mr. Blake, when I tell you that he is a member that has to be handled as such. In this case you will, I suppose, too, that I want you to be as cool a commander of your men as you can."

If you were asked to meet Mr. Hayne at any other house in the garrison than mine, would you desire to accept? You are aware of all the circumstances, the adjutant tells me."

"I am, sir, and have just announced my intention of calling upon him."

"Then will you dine with us this evening to meet Mr. Hayne?"

"I will do so with pleasure, sir."

It could hardly have been an hour afterwards when Mrs. Rayner entered the library in her cosey home and found Miss Travers entertaining herself with a book.

"Have you written to Miss Van Antwerp this morning?" she asked. "I thought that was what you came here for."

"I did mean to, but Mrs. Waldron came here, and I was interrupted."

"It is fully fifteen minutes since she left, Nellie. You might have written two or three pages already; and you know that all manner of visitors will be coming in by noon."

"I was just thinking over something she told me. I'll write presently."

"Mrs. Waldron is a woman who talks about everything and everybody. I advise you to listen to her no more than you can help. What was it she told you?"

Miss Travers smiled roguishly: "Why should you want to know, Kate, if you disapprove of my revelations?"

"Oh," with infinite annoyance, "as to that, I wanted to know so as to let you see that it was something unfounded, as usual."

"She said she had just been to tell that the colonel was going to give a dinner party this evening to Mr. Hayne."

"What?"

"She—said—she—had—just—been—told—that—Mr. —colonel—was—going—to give—a dinner party—this evening—to Mr. —Hayne."

"Who told her?"

"Kate, I didn't ask."

"Who are invited? None of yours?"

"Kate, I don't know."

"Where did he say she had heard it?"

"She didn't say."

Mrs. Rayner paused one moment, remember: "Didn't she tell you anything more about it?"

"Nothing, since mine. Why should you feel such an interest in what Mrs. Waldron says, if she's such a gossip? And Miss Travers was evidently having hard work to keep from laughing outright.

"You had better write your letter, said her big sister, and scrambled suddenly out of the room and up the stairs.

A moment later she was at the palmer door with a wrap thrown over her shoulders. "If Capt. Rayner comes in tell him I want particularly to see him before he goes out again."

"Where are you going, Kate?"

"Oh, just over to Mrs. Waldron's a moment!"

CHAPTER IV.

Their hostess led her to the piano.

Facing the broad, blank parade, separated from it only by a rough, unpainted picket fence, and flanked by smooth-trimmed rows of pine, out of which wagons and a stone-house for quartermaster's property, the other as the post trader's depository for skins and furs, there stood the frame cottage which Mr. Hayne had chosen as his home. As has been said, it was precisely like those built for the subaltern officers, so far as material, plan and dimensions were concerned. The locality made the vast difference which really existed. Theirs stood all in a row, fronting the grassy level of the parade, surrounded by verandas, bordering on a well kept gravel path and an equally well graded drive. Clear, sparkling water rippled in tiny acequias through the front yards of each, and so furnished the moisture needed for the life of the various little shrubs and flowering plants. The surroundings were at least "sociable," and there was companionship and jollity, with its occasional tiff to keep things lively. The married officers, as a rule, had chosen their quarters farthest from the entrance gate and nearest those of the colonel commanding. The bachelors, except the two or three who were old in the service and had "rank" in lieu of accommodation, were all bunked together along the eastern end, a situation that had disadvantages as compared with the cosy which rejoiced the frequent presence of the occupants at the court martial rooms or, by headquarters, and that contemptuously far distant from the hospital on the sickness. It had its accommodations in being convenient to the card room and billiard table at "the store," and in embracing within its limits one house which possessed mysterious interest in the eyes of every woman and most of the men in the garrison. It was said to be haunted.

A sorely perplexed man was the post quartermaster when the rumor came out from the railway station that Mr. Hayne had arrived and was coming to report for duty. As a first lieutenant he would have choice of quarters over every second lieutenant in the garrison. There were ten of these young gentlemen, and four of the ten were married. Every set of quarters had its occupants, and Hayne could move in nowhere, unless as occupant of a room or two in the house of some comrade, without first compelling others to move out. This proceeding would lead to vast discomfort, occurring as it would in the dead of winter, and the youngsters were naturally perturbed in spirit—their wives especially so. What made the prospects infinitely worse was the fact that the cavalry lieutenants were already living three-deep; the only spare rooms were in the quarters of the colonel commanding and the adjutant, and they were not available.

right of the people to criticise public officials has been cast down by the full bench of the Massachusetts Supreme Court. In 1807, when the Beverly Statute Bill was pending in the Legislature, Perry Collier of Beverly was present at a meeting, held in Danvers, by citizens of that town, for the purpose of considering the expediency of instructing its representatives in regard to their votes on the division question. During the evening Collier said, in speaking of Malcolm Hillard, the member for Danvers and Middleton: "I am sorry that the representative from this district has had a change of heart. Sometimes the change of heart comes from the pocket." Hillard, upon hearing of Collier's remarks, brought a suit to recover damages for a criminal slander. The defendant filed a demurrer, which the superior court sustained, and the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, which has affirmed the decision of the defendant.

The court, in an interesting opinion, says: "The declaration in favor of the plaintiff does by the construction it is intended to aver that he was a member of the House of Representatives, and that the words set forth were spoken of him with reference to his official position. This being so, no averment of special damages was necessary, provided the words were in themselves actionable. The words imputed to the plaintiff do not necessarily import a charge of crime. It would be unfounded if they imported such misconduct as would expose him to expulsion, or even to censure from the House, and we are inclined to think also that it would be sufficient if they imported such conduct as would be the legitimate cause of public enmity, or deprive him of the confidence of his constituents, or otherwise to render him unworthy of public favor, or to bring him into public disrepute. It is not the publication of words that a person or body is thus exposed to criticism, and even to censure, commensurate; but simply unless they pass the bounds of what the law will tolerate, must be borne for the sake of maintaining free speech."

The court also holds that the plaintiff's contention cannot be sustained that an action should be maintained on the ground that it is for the interest and true dignity of the commonwealth that the assembly of magnates shall not be permitted.

A Frenchman at Santa Fe, New Mexico, has brought from Paris the secret of the manufacture of a new and cheap building material, which he is about starting in a good business. In Paris he found large, extensive bulk of cemented mixtures, of which volcanic sand is the chief ingredient. This sand exists in vast quantities near Santa Fe. The other known ingredients are lime and water, and the secret is in the fourth ingredient, and in the proportions used.
